SPECTRE

FOREST MYSTERY.

Mr. Brown trembled with excitement as he opened the parcel, and spread the contents on the floor of the office. They were the drab pants and the brown coat and vest, spotted with blood, and also the keeps, rusted with gore! He bid George repeat again the manner in which the tatter was found, and then cried— Strange! Strange! With such proof as this,

Mr. Crapliffe, no power can save him; he MUST be convicted! "Mr. Brown, I will liberally reward you for your service after this affair is over. I would remit you a fee now, but I have hardly enough upon which to live until the time when I receive my property again." Brown bowed his head in acknowledgment.

and replied-"Thank you, Mr. Cranliffs. I am not a very rich man in money, but I flatter myself that my clients seidom regret liberality, for I never loss a case commenced."

Tou must be very skillful then," remarked George. "And now Mr. Brown to propose my plan. Nelson Bredford will be arrested at my wife's scensa', as before intended, and as her evidence may not be sufficient to punish him, at the moment when he is congratulating himself that he will escape, I will appear as a witness against him. These articles I will leave in your charge to be produced at the proper time." "That's just my idea."

"Welt, then, sir, as this business is settled. I will depart. I shall not see you again, until just before the trial. This visit, as well as the fact that I am living, must be kept privy from all; my wife must knew naught of it."

"It shall; but I can't get over my fright," said Brown, as George arose. "I was confound.

"'Twas very natural, sir," replied he, "and, as I have to'd you you are not the only one who thought they saw a spirit."

'Tis strange you have not been discov " I was too cautions for that; I should not have ventured here, but knowing you were shut out intruders." "I had forgotten that in my excitement recognizing you. What a commotion this series of incidents will produce, la this little village! Mr. Crantiffe, I shall win a name by

"I trust you will, sir, and now - good night." He wrapped his cloak closely around him, and hastened cautiously forth into the open air, he looked around, no one was in sight, so he hurried away.

The attorney, after examining again and again the bundle left in his charge, placed it in a secret closet, chuckling as he did so-"Ahe, the villain's caught now-my fortune's made!" A short time after the office was in darkness, and Mr. Brown snugly ensconced in bed, dreaming of exercises in the form be would win, in the speech he was going to make at the trial.

How soundly lawyers can sleep with the knowledge sometimes that a life rests with them? how fondly they dwell on the condemning, or pathetic speech, the pet object of the brain. 'Iwouldn't do for every one to be a lawyersome hearts are too tender.

CHAPTER XV.

VILLAGE GOSSIPS. GLIMPSE OF A MOTHER'S HEART.

"There are the spiders of society,
They weave their pletty webs of ites, and sneers,
And lie themselves in ambush for the spoil."

"I could not tell thee if I would,
The fears that rack a mother's heart,

"Good morning, Mrs. Knowall. What do you think of the coming marriage in this village? for my own part, I think it is scandalous."

Mrs. Cranliffe you mean, do you not, Mrs. Grundy? I think she had better cover her face for shame, and not appear sgain for a year, at least. I'm sure I should be forever disgraced, if my daughter should do such a thing."

"Yes, and Knowall, how she affected at the burial of the poor man! Pity he wouldn't arise from his grave. to confront her with 'hypocri-

"Pity he wouldnt!" responded Knowall. "He is hardly cold in his windin' sheet, before she turns round, and marries one of the neighbors, and he must want a wife, I think! There was a plenty of others he could have chosen; my 'darter' or yours, for instance. I'm sure she led him into a trap, but she will pay for it. I remember enct when I was a gal, hearin' my mother tell of a woman, she once knew, who hitched six month after her fust husband's death, and at night, she used to see his ghost," (her voice sank to a low mysterious whisper) "and four months after, she was struck by lightnin'. That shows ! depend upon it"-she laid her finger in the palm of her hand, as she continued-"she will come to no good."

Mrs. Grundy acquiesced with a nod or two of her head, and then related a similar story, until Mrs. Knowall's little boy, Jim, ran up, and ex-

"Ob, mom ! Sall's gone out, an' left the baby squallin' as loud as ginger, an' the kittle's bilin'

The lady gave him a box on the ear, and bidding her dear friend Grundy, a good morning, seized him by the collar, and hurried him indignantly away, pouring out a torrent of threats upon his devoted head, for interrupting her, in the midst of her interesting chat.

Mrs. Grundy smiled maliciously, as she observed her, and turned up the road, she had not rocceded far, before she perceived Virginia Remson walking alowly toward her, bearing a hendsome book in her hand.

"Good morning, Miss Remson!" she exclaimed, but the young girl did not hear her, as her attention was fixed on the volume she carried, a second time she repeated her selutation, and Virginia returning it, was about to pass on, but the gossip was not going to let her escape so

"Miss Remson, I suppose you have heard of the marriage that is coming off." "I have."

"Well, did you ever see two mortals so suited to each other, as they are? They were cut out for one another. I've often heard it said, when a woman marries a man, who isn't her second self, he is taken away, to make room for her mate, but I don't believe it's true, do you."

"I am sure, Mrs. Grundy, I know nothing about it, but Mr. Bradford and Mrs. Cranliffe, must be mutually satisfied, or they would not have come to terms."

"That's my opinion, but Mrs. Knowall declares she ought to be ashamed, and says she led him into a trap, but, is! what a pretsy ring that to upon your finger, somethin' like my Maryanne's!

Virginia extended her small white hand, upon which glistened a splendid diamond, upon the setting of which, was engraved—"From Harry, to Vinginia."

Mrs. Grundy had seen enough, when she read the words, and after commenting upon its beauty,

But I never pay much attention to what Knowall says, for she is a dirty, slovenly wretch, and her children are always running into the neighbors, to find out where she is, as she's always runnin out, leavin her darter, the humliest, red faced girl in the place, to do the work, but she ain't no better'n her mother, and ginnerally foilers her example. She had the imnce to insinervate, that Mr. Bradford might have chosen Sali for a wife, just like her !"

Virginia thought it was now time to end this highly edifying conversation, and bidding her a polite good day, she turned away, just as Mrs. Nothingno joined the immsculate Grundy. The tale of the wedding was again repeated, the conversation of Knowall and Virginia annexed, with some additions, which were only interrupted by such expressions, as- 'Du tell! I want to know! &c." from the worthy listener. As a wind up. Grundy exclaimed.

"Would you believe it, that proud Virginia Remson, showed me a diamond ring, on her finger, with the words- 'From Harry to Virginia', on it! No doubt she just wanted me to see that the designing minx! Harry, means Harry Cranliffe, the widew's brother in law, he's an overbearing wretch."

But, reader, are you not already tired of village chat? if so, we will weary you no longer, with the senselees, malicious tattle, falling like a cataract from the mouths of scandal mongers, always to be found in such a place, and bad as they are, they are excelled by their sisters in Virginia had left the outskirts of the village, and was said sauntering slowly along, her eyes fastened upon her book, when a gay voice exclaimed.

"Whither away, lady fair, this sunshing morning?"

She raised her face, and beheld Harry approaching, attired in a sporting sait of Lincoln green, his gun in his hand, and a bag of game over his shoulder. "Gunning so early, Harry?" she asked.

"Come, sit down on this mossy stone with me, I have something to say to you." "Most willingly," he replied, flinging his bag and weapon on the grass, and dropping upon the seat, a miniature bower, adorned by natures fair fingers, he took up the book that lay upon her lap, and commenced carelessly to turn over the "Harry, do you know I met Mrs. Grandy this morning; of course you do not, so to set you at rest. I did, and a most amiable discourse she delivered, upon the fact that Mrs. Cranliffe, and Mr. Bradford, were cut out for each other. Now alone, and upon e tering I locked the door, to I did not know this approaching event had circulated so widely through the village; why, she told me Mrs. Knowali's opinion of it, and I don't know how much more, until I was forced to leave her, as I espied one of her estimable friends approaching, and I dreaded another lecture. Is it not singular, how a thing will be bruited around, and canvassed, and talked over, by every idle gossip in the place?"

"'Twouldn't be the case, dearest, if they would mind their own business and not meddle with other people's; but every place has its regular gossips, and well disposed poople are obliged to suffer them, no matter how much against their will."

"For my part," resumed Virginia, "I-despise a female, or indeed a male meddler—one who can never rest unless scandalizing their neigh-"I pity them also, Jennie, for they are too ignorant to know better." "And so do I; but, now, Harry, tell me, do, exactly, what you think of your sister's marriage."

"I know not what to think, it puzzles me." "And me, too! I see no affinity in the natures of those two individuals. Surely one so lovely as Mrs. Cranliffe, cannot love that man, for Harry, beneath his polished exterior, and assumed cordiality, I think I detect a heart not true and good, but deeply, darkly inclined. I like him not."

A shadow overspread Harry's face, as he ques- FOR SALE-A SMALL COFFEE AND "Have you ever conversed with him, that you form so strange an o, in on." "Never, but I have closely observed him when passing, and thus my impression has been received."

"I am glad, my Virginia, that you have not come in actual contact with Bradford, for I cannot esteem him, and do not deem him worthy to hold converse with so pure, so innocent a flower as yourself." Harry drew her head to his bosom, and looked lovingly into the violet eyes raised fondly to his own; at length she murmured: "What sin has he been guilty of, that you thus dislike him ?"

"Some future time, Virginia, you shall know all." Assuming a more tender tone, he continued : "The subject of the coming wedding reminds me of a promise you made to name the happy day that would give me the right to call you," he breathed the words softly, "my wife." A blush mantled Virginia's cheek, her eyes were cast down, her hand trembled in his, and she did not reply.

"Why this agitation, dearest?" whispered he, after a pause. "Do you fear to trust your future happiness solely to my keeping? Is there a doubt arises in your gentle heart?" he asked, in tones of mournful repreach.

A tear started to her eyes, as she raised them to his face and replied, "No, Harry, not that! you are too noble, too good, too gentle, too kind, for me to doubt." "What then, Virginia?-You weep!

"Nothing, only I am silly, crying for I do not know what!" and a smile hovered about her lips, seeing which, Harry playfully said; "Only you wish to keep me in suspense, or prefer my stating the time, which I very readily consent to do;" and lightly laying his tand upon her mouth to prevent her giving utterance to the words which tumbled upon them, he resumedwhen once I name it, it must be a great inducement that shall persuade me to alter it. So now, I set this day, four weeks, you see I am liberal, as the momentous time, when Virginia Remsen spinster, shall be ready to lay aside that title, all excuses, &c., to the contrary, to accept the appallation of Mrs. Harry Cranliffe! '

"Liberal indeed, master Harry!" exclaimed she, as he removed his fingers from her lips. "Liberal indeed! Now I beg leave to decline according to that agreement."

"On what grounds?" "That it is entirely too short a space to allow me to consider the matter, and sund y other excuses."

"And what shall be my inducement, to extend you a greater length of time?" "The promise that I will agree to your wish this day, three months hence."

"Three months hence! entirely too long a period madam," he returned merrily. "I couldn't think of such a thing. I should commit suicide from sheer despair." But at length, at Virginia's earnest request, he assented to her desire, and it was formally decided that they should be united on the twentieth day of October, about an interval of three months from the present.

After a short pause, Virginia arose, remarking that somebody at the villa would be teasing her about her long stay, taking his gun and game, he proceeded with her to Rose villa, and after flinging his feathered offering at the feet of Mrs. Remsen, begging her to accept the addition to the larder, he departed, with Edward's mischiev-ous inquiry, "Whether Jennie had contributed any to the spoil?" ringing in his cars.
